Sponge Balls

When planning a summer water party for the kids, one of the first activities that popped into my head was water balloons. But I dreaded having to clean up all those latex bits in my yard, not to mention filling dozens of water balloons before the party. Then I remembered something I had seen Martha Stewart create – sponge balls. (Thanks Martha.)

Not only are they practical and reusable, they are cute!

What you need:

- Colorful Sponges* Curling Ribbon or String* Bucket of Water

To create your sponge balls, start by cutting sponges into strips. I used small kitchen sponges, which each yielded seven strips about 3/4 of an inch wide. (I did not measure, I just eyeballed it.) Then I gathered my strips and tied them tightly in the center with curling ribbon. (You could use simple string, but I always have a lot of curling ribbon on hand so that's what I used.) Once your strips are bound, fluff and ta-da.

On the day of the party, I filled a bucket with water, tossed in the balls and let the kids loose. While some of the bigger kids had a blast tossing them, the little kids loved squishing them and pretending to bathe in the bucket. Lol.
